

As a farmer uses fertilizers and enough water to make the trees grow, the Foundation provides series of continuous and compulsory seminars with the grantees where they study leaderships all different aspects with good books on sociology, leadership, psychology, conflict resolution, etc. During these seminars, they also practice their presentation skills and their ability to convey a message.

When a branch of a tree goes in the wrong direction, the farmer cuts it off but also covers the wound so it can heal. In the Foundation, the grantees are given constructive criticisms that will help them develop their potentials and improve their personalities. The reward of the farmer is seeing the tree grow healthy and beautiful, as this is the fulfillment of the Foundation – seeing the grantees develop holistically and grow to become great leaders.
